EXHIBIT J
The close shave has the people who run the elections - and the judges, county clerks and registrars - worried. "It's just not very wise what they're doing," Morrison said.

The voter registration system was designed to be "compliant" and "adaptable," said Jeff Egan, a spokesman for the elections department. "But the committee did hold any contract for 45 days in which case the secretary of state could start over."

But the committee can hold any contract for 45 days, in which case the secretary of state could start over. "It's just a missed deadline," said Egan, who works for the elections department. "We have a missed deadline." A spokesperson for the secretary of state's office said that deadline was March 10, and that the deadline was extended to March 15.

The committee must give notice of the missed deadline, and the deadline must be extended to March 15, according to a spokesperson for the state's elections department. The deadline is set for Dec. 31 for new systems, officials said.

State to miss voter registration deadline

The Eustisville Group

Everything Alabama
And Herston wondered that it's state didn't meet the deadline. Whatever it would lose its federal funding to but Phillips said ever county uses ALVIN, notably Jefferson County which uses ES8S.

Throughout the process, Worley has maintained that Alabama has a standalone voter registration system, and software, which had recommended an advisory committee, which held recommended election systems

The process has been rocky since the beginning. Worley originally gave the bid to DeSoto Integrated to meet the deadline. "We're holding up all of our parts. " said the new system "has got all of the needs it needs to in $32 million given to the office to implement the new system

But Republican spokesman Jeff Emerson said Worley's office already has the money to pay the fees - included

"We need the system up and running as fast as we possibly can to ensure we have the new system in place as quickly as we

new voting system

I don't think it could be done and be ready for the primary election, Herston said

are ready to go live on a new system

Madison County Voter Registrar Linda Treadwell said the registrars haven't heard anything from Worley and train workers. the system should have been released months ago.

The state had already started implementing a new system, Phillips said, noting that it takes time to

Phillips said the judges have considered taking Worley to court

"I'm very surprised," said Covington County Probate Judge Shane Phillips, head of the Probate Judge's

"I don't think it could be done and be ready for the primary election," Herston said.

are ready to go live on a new system